Hesiod, who wrote in the eighth century before Christ, advises young men not to be led astray by certain women of his day, who wore their elothes puffed out behind. Thus it will be seen that the bustle is not, as many suppose, a hideous deformity of modern invention, but is a relic of old-time barbarism, handed down through the dim and musty corridors of the past, along with other horrible monstorsities.

From the Indianapolis Journal.

A bashful young Georgian, who was afraid to propose to his sweetheart, induced her to fire at him with a pistol, which he assured her was only loaded with powder, and after she had done so fell down and pretended to be dead.
